

Changing jobs doesn't mean changing super

September 2015

This fact sheet outlines why it's important to choose your super fund and how to do it.

Don't waste money on multiple accounts – choose where your super goes

If you're like most Australians, you probably have more than one super fund. Even changing jobs once could mean you have two funds, costing you around $10 a week in unnecessary fees*.

Why choice is important

As a Prime Super member, you enjoy the benefits of being with an industry fund. We don't charge any contribution, withdrawal, termination or investment switching fees. Plus, you have Income Protection and Death & Disability insurance available to you.

But, if you don't nominate a super fund when you change jobs, your compulsory super contributions will be paid into your new employer's nominated 'default' fund.

A different super fund may not offer the same benefits, and could charge you more and/or higher fees. You may also have less generous insurance cover available to you.

Whichever choice you make, remember to check the fine print and consider whether you need financial advice.

You can choose where your super goes (and it's easy)

If your employer offers a choice of fund (most do) you can choose where your super goes. Simply fill in the form on the other side and hand it to your employer. They'll then start making contributions into your Prime Super account.

So don't let your super pile up. Exercise your right to choose today.
